Position statement on clinical evaluation of imaging AI

Governments and medical associations across the world, Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency, and do not require additional clinical expertise the Royal College of Radiologists, and the European will be the most radical change in how medical care is solution

Traditionally, the basis of medical image interpretation relies on a visual, mainly qualitative, assessment, and experience. For example, in oncological practice, generated by a human). Quantitative metrics are including the US Food and Drug Administration, the UK objective, often simple to use via statistical software,

Concerns with this quantitative-metrics-only approach Society of Radiology, believe the advent of health exist. First, a quantitative-metrics-only approach to technologies associated with artificial intelligence (AI) performance evaluation might not give a clear indication of the performance of an AI algorithm in clinical practice; delivered in our lifetime.¹⁰ At a time of unprecedented in some cases this evaluation might underestimate AI demand for medical imaging, when hospitals struggle algorithms with genuine clinical value and in other cases, with staffing shortages, AI tools could provide a most worryingly, it might overestimate their clinical utility. This misinterpretation can lead to vast amounts of developer time being wasted, producing tools with no potential for clinical translation.4 Second, the quoted which is dependent on the observer's level of training quantitative performance is often assessed on private, retrospective, and sometimes in-silico datasets. Third,
